Not illustrated. 1866 Excerpt: .me drink from a long, narrow, greenish glass I know not what cordial, but twas marvellous sweet and fragrant. Mine ears still rang with confused murmurs, like as of bees among lime-tree blossoms, and when I assayed to speak, ye elder lady imposed upon me silence for awhile, saying I had best remain I was for a time, to recover from effect of my swoond. Thereupon, having with a light hand bandaged my brow, she dismissed the youth, and turned to her tapestiy-work, at which her daughter joined her; both of em working at the same piece, with their backs to me, where I lay on ye settle; and I marked the youngest continually whispering into her mother s ear, the circumstantial of our rencounter, I question not, with the air of most entire confidence and assurance of sympathy; after which they pursued their work in silence. I could not but secretly marvel, to find myself thus domesticated and carefully tended by persons of whom I knew not so much as the names; and thought there must be something of Providence in it. Questionless, there was something of romance. The likeness and yet distinction between mother and daughter was singular both were tall, but the mother stooped a little, yet seemingly not from age; the daughter was as straight as an arrow, and lithe as a corn stalk swaying in the summer air. The mother was fair, but colourless: the tints of the other reminded one...
